The Army established the Fund to: (1) simplify the ammunition procurement process; (2) reduce the paperwork incident to that process; and (3) reduce ammunition costs by consolidating procurements and awarding contracts earlier to avoid inflation effects. GAO also found that: (1) while the Army believes that the Fund has saved millions of dollars, many of these savings occurred because of increases in program quantities; (2) while the Army maintains that it can use unexpended budget balances that the Fund retained from prior program years, it must return the unexpended balances to the Treasury; and (3) paperwork savings attributable to the Fund have been offset by other administrative burdens which have increased since the Fund's implementation. In addition, GAO found that: (1) Congress should not grant the Fund advance contracting authority because it would drastically reduce congressional discretion in funding the overall ammunition program; and (2) the Army could more efficiently use continuing resolution authority in connection with the Fund's operations if the military services submitted...
